Canyon Riders was inspired by the works of Edgar Payne and my own travels in the Southwest. I drew and painted from a very young age, so I have always had a desire to create things artistic. After college, I spent my life as an award-winning illustrator, graphic designer, and a one-person ad agency, doing it all. Today I paint both in plein air and in my studio. I paint in different styles as the subject moves me because my artwork is a journey through my own vision, which is sometimes quite abstract and other times, very realistic. I paint what I love. I paint the places I've been, and places I want to be. I paint where I can smell the air, feel the sunlight, and lose myself in the dark shadows. I paint with explosions of color and big brush strokes, and I paint with fine detail because some things are just that way. I paint to share my journey and my vision, and to celebrate the beauty that is around us.
